Excerpt: .of estimating the katabolism of protein involved in the disintegration of the true tissues, the problem of the nitrogenous requirements of the body from this standpoint would appear to be solved. Such a method has been supposed to be forthcoming in the determination of the creatinine-nitrogen of the urine, which has been regarded as a measure of the endogenous or tissue metabolism. If the nitrogen in the form of creatinine were a measure of the katabolism of the tissue cells, then the heat value of a diet being sufficient, the same amount of nitrogen supplied in the food as lost to the body in the form of creatinine should be sufficient to meet the protein requirements of the body, make good the loss due to true tissue change, and maintain the subject in a condition of nitrogenous equilibrium. The average amount of this creatinine-nitrogen...
