It will be seen that the long axis of the larva in fig. 25, and the long axes of the larvae derived from the same egg, in fig. 26i are approximately parallel to the principal dorso-ventral-axis of the original egg. Summary And Conclusion. An isolated blastomere of the Molgula egg segments as if still forming a corresponding part of an entire embryo. The cleavage phenomena are strictly partial, as regards the origin of cells, the inclination of cleavage-planes, and especiall y in respect to the rhythm of segmentation. The general appearance of the fragment differs materially from that of a half of a complete embryo, for the reason that rearrangements of the blastomeres occur, which tend progressively to mask the partial nature of development. The end result is a larva of less than normal size, and with defects in certain of its systems. These defects are undoubtedly due to the fact that but a portion of the normal amount of material is available for the formation of the larva; that, for instance, the chorda of a larva derived from a one-half blastomere, receives but one-half of the normal number of cells, and consequently a chorda of one row, and not two rows of cells, results. In conclusion, one is constrained to adopt the view of Rouxnamely, that in Molgula as in the well-known case of the echino, derms (Driesch, Wilson, and others) the development begins as...
